a. Write a précis passage for the following extract:

More broadly speaking, the milieus in which children spend their early years exert a very strong impact on the standards by which they subsequently judge the world around them. Whether in relation to fashion, food, geographical environment, or manner of speaking, models initially encountered by children continue to affect their tastes and preferences indefinitely, and these preferences prove very difficult to change. Closely related to standards of taste are an emerging set of beliefs about which behaviours are good and which values are to be cherished.

In most cases, these standards initially reflect quite faithfully the value system encountered at home, at temple, and at preschool or elementary school. Values with respect to behaviour (you should not steal, you should salute the flag) and sets of beliefs (my country, right or wrong, all mommies are perfect, God is monitoring all of your actions) often exert a very powerful effect on children's actions and reactions. In some cultures, a line is drawn early between the moral sphere, where violations merit severe sanctions, and the conventional sphere, where practices are simply a matter of taste or custom; in other cultures, all practices are evaluated along a single dimension of morality. Even and perhaps especially when children are not conscious of the source and of the controversy surrounding these beliefs and values, unfortunate clashes may occur when they meet others raised with a contrasting set of values.

Children carry around in their consciousness a large number of scripts, stereotypes, models, and beliefs. Examined analytically, these conceptual schemas may harbour many internal contradictions: Boys are better than girls versus I love my mother and hate my father; teachers are mean and bossy versus I want to be a teacher when I grow up. Rarely, however, are these contradictions noted, and even when they are, they rarely trouble the child. I would suggest, further, that adults carry about with them a similar set of conflicting statements and sentiments (for example, in the political sphere) whose contradictory nature rarely proves troublesome in everyday life. It should be apparent, however, that contradictory perspectives can interfere with formal learning.
